Gunnorsbury History

1/ History about Gunnorsbury (Reading)

Gunnorsbury Park and Museum has a very interesting history. Many different people have lived there. A Palladian mansion (pulled down after Princess Amelia's death) was built in 1665 and owned by John Maynard. It was very grand for its time.

During her time at Gunnorsbury, Princess Amelia, daughter of King George II, spent over £20,000 improving the house, particularly on the gardens.

In 1802, Alexander Copeland bought the house and built Gunnorsbury Park House, which now houses the museum. This was even grander and overlooked the landscaped grounds.

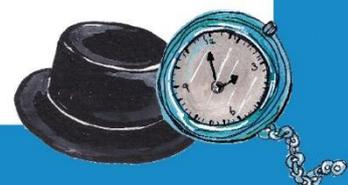

Gunnorsbury Park House became home to the Rothschild family in 1835. Here they hosted important aristocrats, politicians and businessmen of the time.

The Rothschild family made many improvements to the estate. These include adding a large kitchen, rebuilding the stables, building an orangery and glasshouses for flowers and fruit. They also bought more land to create a lake.

In the 1920s, Gunnorsbury estate was sold to what are now Ealing and Hounslow Councils and opened as a museum. Minister for Health and future Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, opened the park in 1926 and he said he,

"...rejoiced that the people had come into the possession of so magnificent and historical park..."

Today, Gunnorsbury Park and Museum is a showcase for objects and archives relating to the history of Ealing and Hounslow and the stories of the communities that shape them. Some memorabilia of the Rothschilds remain, including their family crest and travelling carriage.
